I'm trying to make sense of how SSL works and how it interacts with SSL2. I'm particularly interested in whether or not SSL actually degrades to SSL2 at lower strengths of the key and whether or not SSL2 is used in SSL 3. A: SSL works on the basis that the end of your SSL tunnel is an SSL server, that means you need SSL3. SSL2 would not be relevant here, as it's a different protocol. SSL3 is an extension to SSL, in fact the SSL3 security is also shared between SSL2 and SSL 3. SSL2 is actually an implementation detail of SSL 3. They are entirely different protocols. You can even have SSL2 and SSL 3 running on a single connection, as long as one SSL3 cipher suite (i.e. a supported cipher) is used. There is no difference between SSL and SSL2. They are two different protocols. This might be useful: That blog post explains why you should use SSL3. You can only use a specific set of cipher suites. 82157476af
